

This Thursday, there will be a discussion in the Dáil.

They will talk about a report called a 'Report on the Wards of Court'.

The report was published in February 2018.

The report is about wards of court. A ward of court is a person who has been told they can't make their own decisions.

Wards of Court are made using an old law called the Lunacy Act. Wards often have their money managed for them by the court.

The report says that some people are worried that their money was lost by the courts. The report says this should be looked into.

The report says that it can be hard for people and their families to get information. The report says this should be looked into.

The report says that some people, whose money is running out may need care and support. The report says that the government should make a plan for this.

Inclusion Ireland thinks that a new law called the Assisted Decision-Making (Capacity) Act would make things better.

This law would mean there would be no more wards of court.

This law would mean that people could get the help they need to make decisions.

This law should be put in place as soon as possible.
